Who is the Yarnbomber?

Stephen Duneier is an avid outdoorsman, logging well over 1,000 miles a year in the mountains of Santa Barbara, California. He hikes, bikes, runs, unicycles, barefoots and even uses jumping stilts to traverse the trails.

What is a Yarnbomb?

A yarnbomb is simply an art installation with yarn as the medium. The "Whoas!", "Wows!" and smiles that instinctively interrupt deep conversations and exhaustive panting as hikers turn the corner and see them for the first time, serve as evidence of the power of his installations.

Newsweek

"Duneier's public installations induce a calm, even meditative experience."

"It's a unique, creative enterprise.

It encourages people to get out there.

This is a positive."

Effecting Positive Change

What began as one man's new year's resolution has grown into an international phenomenon with a rapidly building social media following, features in major print publications and on television around the world. Most importantly though, Yarnbomber is succeeding in his mission to draw people outdoors, to explore the wilderness, and he's doing so in a responsible, eco-friendly and innovative way.

"We are very excited about working with an artist who is so bright and who is producing art so far outside the confines of the 'regular' art world. This guy is the real McCoy."

"Weeks later, students are still talking about it and teachers continue to weave it into their lessons."

Celeste Darga

Independent Santa Barbara WHO. WHAT. NOW.

"I giggled out loud and quickened my pace toward it. I was alone, camera-less, and completely thrilled. That accidental discovery of joyful and ridiculous and anonymous art in a place I never expected to find it creates a heady sort of magic that I, for one, cannot get enough of."

Ethan Stewart
Santa Barbara Independent

"Santa Barbara is fortunate to have a master practicing the craft right in our backyard. Duneier inspires people to be more creative and have more fun outside – especially in the mountains."
